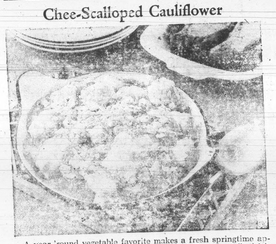
Vegetable Deluxe:

Chee-Scalloped Cauliflower



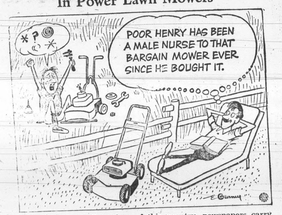
A year-round vegetable favorite makes a fresh springtime appearance in a new version, "Chee-Scalloped Cauliflower", this a an elegant addition to any menu. Easy on the budget, and very easy to prepare, this new dish gets all its delicious cheese flavor from crushed inch-square cheese crackers used with tomato soup in making the sauce. More of the same tasty crackers are crumbled over the top for extra flavor accent. A single medium-size cauliflower makes four generous servings. Here's how:

Chee-Scalloped Cauliflower

1 medium head of cauliflower, or 1 pkg. frozen cauliflower
1 10½-oz. can cream of tomato soup
1 cup crushed Cheez-It Crackers
1 teaspoon instant onion flakes
2 teaspoons chopped fresh parsley, or 1 teaspoon parsley flakes
1 tablespoon butter or margarine

Remove outer stalks from head of cauliflower; separate flowerettes and cook in boiling salted water for 10 minutes. Or, cook frozen cauliflower as package directs. Drain. Arrange in greased 1-quart casserole. Blend together tomato soup, half of cheese cracker crumbs, onion and parsley. Pour over cauliflower. Sprinkle with remaining crumbs and dot with butter. Bake, uncovered, at 375°F. (moderately hot oven) for 20 minutes, or until sauce is bubbly hot. Makes 4 servings.

There IS A Difference In Power Lawn Mowers



Every day, in all sections of this country, newspapers carry advertisements expounding the virtues of power-driven, gas or electric lawn mowers. Usually, prices vary all over the lot and the terrific range in prices is prime cause for confusion. Why should one unit sell for $89.95 and another of the same cutting capacity, only $39.95. For all the buyer knows, the $40 unit might cut his lawn as well as the more expensive mower. The spread of $50 represents too great a margin of difference to remain unexplained.

Why the huge difference in price? There is, of course, an immediate answer. You simply can't buy quality, service, integrity and responsibility at discount prices.

For the first few hours, the "promotional mower" will cut a lawn just about as well as any quality product while the blade is new and sharp. However, in all probabilities, the housing will crack, and the blade will chip and break if it is made of inferior metal. In other words, the whole unit is worthless after a season of mowing. The buyer, when anything happens, has no recourse. No parts are available, no service contract exists and there is no company to which he can call for assistance.

Pennsylvania Power Mower authorities maintain, and rightly so, that if you need to replace your mower every few years, and spend your weekends fixing instead of relaxing you've made a poor bargain. You'll want to look for quality, not in terms of high price, but in terms of features such as folding handles for easy storage; forced-feed pressure lubrication (similar to your car); tamalee-type starting to eliminate rope jerking; and height of cut adjustments for spring, summer and fall mowing within seconds These values should be in the mind of bargain hunters.
